

The Crisis in America

phone taps on private citizens, including me, in Paris. It's a perfectly open shop. In fact, one of the French ministers recently dedicated a phone tapping center in Paris, on the ribbon and all.

Just the French business-ness was concerned. They are. A foreigner maintaining uated becoming increasingly precarious.

But my cab driver in Paris the other day praised Nixon for his attitude with the Soviet Union and China and declared Watergate to be a justification of the American system. And now our magazines have been hating the French government for sending its schools under the Paris instandards of "the America."

Soil tests two feet below water table and above are slightly acid.

"What Watergate has most clearly portrays is the mortality of these men and of Nixon himself. I've been saying for 20 years that Nixon is a haunted, paranoid man who thinks everyone is out to get him."

He was traumatized in '47 during the Hiss case. He said the liberals were out to get him. In '52, he was traumatized when his steel lung was discovered. In '56, he was traumatized because he thought the election was stolen. (I'm not commenting if it's true or not.)

I think all the Watergate activities, the domestic intelligence plans, the burglary, the bugging, are just a reflection of those fears. And I think the whole scandal would have passed over us had not the good judgment to separate himself from his political friends like John Edgar Hoover and

(Bob) Haldeman right away."

Schauer bristles at the suggestion that similar tactics such as harassment reporters, might have been used by JFK. For example, didn't Kennedy try to have David Halberstam fired from the New York Times for writing a harsh Vietnam

"I told him I was dangerous and tried to stop him," he said.
"It was a mistake, but he didn't believe me. When I raised my hands they hit me hard."
He said later he had realized it was a mis-and didn't seemed to be experience.

Yessens gave a conversation concerning the Bay of Pigs Invasion of the historical significance. He probably didn't tell the people in the room.

And what about certain coverups. Did Kennedy as the President suppress information about the Bay of Pigs incident?

But I know about the way of life, except that the Times had been printing long stories about covert operations that were taken place in Cuba. Like training insurgents, and I wanted to ask them not to print anymore.

But I do know firsthand of two other cases when the White House asked the FBI to get the bodies.

Only concerned the release of two American pilots who had been shot down when their plane strayed over Soviet territory. The New York Herald Tribune had the information that they were about to be released.

When Kennedy learned of it, he called Jack Whinnery and asked him not to print it. Khrushchev might call off the dog.

"Kennedy accepted the Trip himself. He announced the release at a press conference the next day."

The second case concerned the Cuban missile crisis.

The New York Times and Washington Post are were aware that Russians had landed missiles in Cuba and were planning the story for their morning edition. The president, however, called and asked them to hold off until after 10:00 a.m. or 11:00 a.m. to give our first broadcast a chance to make an impact.

But they did because they knew returning to the United States would affect national security. It's an interesting idea, and some two persons were asked by the FBI to print the Penton of F. persons. They refused. In the end, they were not to be put in the national security.

Sahinger says that when Kennedy visited the fair, something he did will help Senator Edward Kennedy in 1976.

"I think he'll run," said Salinger.

What about Chappaquiddick and the appearance of such bumper stickers as "Nobody Drowned at W. 2000"?

They may be able to squawk in Washington, but just go outside the capital. They're looking for president. He's the best bet here. He's got the ball. He's been a good soldier.

With the tenth anniversary of John Kennedy's coming up in November, are lots of Kennedy biographies and TV documentaries.
